In 2009, a study found people who rated themselves as highly stressed had lower levels of stress hormones after eating chocolate every day for two weeks. In the study which was conducted by the Nestle Research Centre in Switzerland, 30 people ate 40 grams of dark chocolate daily, or a little less than a regular-sized Hershey's bar, which contains 44 grams.

The volunteers showed a significant 'reduction of levels of stress associated hormones and normalisation of the systemic stress metabolic signatures. Researcher Kochlar wrote in the study, which was published in a research journal.

Chocolate may even help you do mathematics, according to a 2009 study conducted by researchers in Northamber University in the United Kingdom. The study showed that people did a better job of counting backward by threes from a random number after they had consumed a hot cocoa drink containing large amounts (500 g, equal to about five bars of chocolate) of flavonoid, an antioxidant found in cocoa beans that can increase blood flow to the brain.

Another study found that small, daily amounts of dark chocolate change the levels of c-reactive protein, which is associated with inflammation in the body. Participants in the 2008 study who ate about 4.5 g of dark chocolate a day had a 'considerably reduced' inflammatory state according to the researchers.

The best effect is obtained by consuming an average amount of 6.7g of chocolate per day corresponding to a small square of chocolate twice a week.

Over the years, studies have steadily uncovered the benefits of chocolate. Most recently, it was found that people who ate a weekly serving of chocolate were 22% less likely to suffer a stroke than those who ate no chocolate.

While chocolate is rich in antioxidants called flavonoids, which may have a protective effect against stroke, study author Sarah Sahib of Master University in Ontario, Canada, noted that, more research is needed to determine whether chocolate truly lowers stroke risks, or whether healthier people are simply more likely to eat chocolate than others.

Here is the short and sweet truth: eating chocolate in moderation, of course does seem to have some legitimate benefits which, may be due to its antioxidants.
